friends who were really keen and they really enjoyed it and it took off from there really."

She made her own and husband Andy's wedding rings and says that couples often want to make their own wedding rings.

And along with her own creations, Aimi also does pawprint and fingerprint jewellery, taking the prints, reducing them in size and using them on a variety of pendants. For fingerprint jewellery, she often works with local funeral directors, when family members want a lasting memento of a child or parent.

She said: "I have always liked jewellery - even as a child it was shiny, sparkling things which caught my attention."

I can definitely recommend taking part in one of Aimi's workshops. She has incredible patience - even when I was doing it wrong, she never once took over - just calmly explained what I needed to do. So I came away with a bespoke piece of jewellery which I can genuinely say I made myself, together with a real sense of achievement.

I won't be swapping my notebook and pen for silver and solder career-wise, but I have a definite feeling that I will be back at a workshop again soon...
